The South Asian Tsunami

On December 26th, 2004 a deadly earthquake occurred on the west coast of Sumatra. The earthquake was caused when the Indian Plate was forced under the Burma Plate during a massive earthquake. This type of fault is known as a subductive or convergent fault. Subductive faults create devastating earthquakes known as "Mega Thrusts", and if the epicentre is located under water deadly tsunamis can form.

The Sumatra-Andaman Earthquake was the largest earthquake ever recorded on a seismograph with a magnitude of 9.1-9.3. The tsunami that followed was one of the most deadly natural disasters in recorded history. When the tsunami hit the coastal regions surrounding the Indian Ocean, the waves were up to 3 meters high. Entire communities were washed away and over 230,000 people in fourteen countries were killed.

Indonesia was the region hit hardest by tsunami and had over 170,000 casualties. According to relief agencies, one-third of deaths were small children who were the least able to resist being overcome by the surging waters. The devastation was so bad that a state of emergency was declared in several countries. Soon after the tsunami, the worldwide community donated more than $14 billion American dollars to assist with humanitarian aid in the effected regions.
